Introduction

Efforts at reforming urban schools have often revolved around choosing the "right" formulaic programs or providing sufficient funds to repair schools. However, too little attention has been paid to staffing schools with competent teachers who desire to stay and effect reform. Finding ways to educate student teachers and novice teachers at these schools so they see themselves as capable of generating substantive change has been difficult. How does a university assist student teachers at urban sites to become both competent and empowered while simultaneously learning to teach? Feiman-Nemser (1990) has described conceptual orientations in teacher education as "cluster[s] of ideas about the goals of teacher preparation and the means for achieving them" (p.1).
