EA-Canada: General. Davidson: Medicine in the Canadian Arctic traders, trappers, explorers, scientists, R.C.M. Police, and government officials of the several departments, have since the earliest history of the North, been keenly interested in the health and welfare of the Eskimos. A great deal of the accumulated knowledge of the needs of these primitive people toward improved health and economic and cultural development has been provided by the day-to-day service rendered and the intimate association of our arctic pioneers with the receptive natives. Any anticipated extension of medical aid and preventive health will still depend to a large degree on the active cooperation of laymen and women domiciled at arctic outposts.

Radio communications have proved a real boon to both the Eskimos and all those trying to serve them. Facilities for intercommunication by this means have been established at almost all remote posts by the Canadian Corps of Signals, by the Department of Transport, Radio Division, and by the Hudson's Bay Company. Laymen as an everyday procedure consult with doctors at the established hospital centers or direct with National Health headquarters. Diagnosis is attempted from case histories and treatment prescribed as a matter of daily routine. This modern auxiliary service is constantly proving of real worth.

With the establishment of strategically placed signal stations and the remarkable development of successful weather forecasting, aviation in Arctic Canada has become the accepted mode of travel. With the recognition of the importance of the Arctic to military continental defence there has been a rapid development of arctic aviation. This has resulted in the possibility of allowing the medical services to extend prompt aid both in the transportation of skilled medical personnel and the transfer of patients from remote areas to places where modern facilities for the treatment of
