

The New Corporatism, Centralization, And The Welfare State

From the Welfare State to the Competition State

This contribution adopts a state- and regulation-theoretical approach to the welfare state in Europe and to the more general issue of whether the EU operates more as a marionette or regisseur. I argue that the concepts of welfare and competition state are too vague to provide a useful account of recent transformations in European statehood and propose instead that a transition is now well under way from different forms of Keynesian welfare national state to different forms of Schumpeterian workfare postnational regime. I also reject the two competing descriptions of the European Union and suggest another, namely, that the EU is a co-dependent co-regisseur of the multilevel metagovernance of the contradictory and conflictual process of Europeanization in a still emerging world society. In this context I further argue that, while the EU is the dominant meta-governance instance in Europe in this regard, it is only a nodal instance of multilevel metagovernance on the global stage.

State-Theoretical Considerations

Prognoses concerning the future of the state include the rise of a new global empire; the rise of a Western hemispheric state; the re-scaling of the nation-state's powers upwards, downwards, or sideways; a shift from state-based government to network-based governance; a shift from a welfare state to a competition state; and a series of incremental changes in secondary aspects of the nation-state that leave its core intact. In addressing these prognoses in relation to the European Union, I make some key assumptions that inform my approach to the two issues introduced above.

First, all forms of state are based on the territorialization of political power. Nonetheless, a system of formally sovereign, mutually recognizing, mutually legitimating national states exercising sovereign control over large and exclusive territorial areas is only a relatively recent institutional expression of state power.
